Re: Appreciating Our President

Dear Editor,

I woke up this morning and said to myself, isn't it great that we have a president that is focused on rebuilding our economy? We've had years of continuous economic growth and lowering unemployment. Isn't it also great that this administration is so competent, hiring the best and brightest in their fields, listening to expert scientists, and making thoughtful decisions after careful study? I also appreciate that this administration has had so little drama, been so honest with the American people and has been essentially devoid of significant scandals that have seemed inevitable in past administrations. The fact is this administration works tirelessly to help people from all walks of life, build a safety net of health care, regulate the banks that caused the great recession, pass rules to reduce pollution, to increase renewable energy, and build improved relationships with our democratic allies around the world.

I am just so pleased... what? What's that you say? That I've been in a coma for the last three years? But wait, wait a second, that means that Obama is not the president of the United States anymore? Oh my gosh, so who is president now?
