Re: Science is faith

Dear Editor,

Virginia Paul (Letters, 6/17/2008) is absolutely correct- science is just a matter of faith. Kind of like when you have a theory that it's sunny outside because you can see the sun through a window. It might be true, but it's still faith. Scientists must be idiots to not know the difference between facts and theories.

Let's settle this argument once and for all. Everyone knows that science is just a collection of facts; things that we know are absolutely true and never change (after all if they changed, how could they still be facts?). We also know that the Bible is the inspired and truthful word of God. Therefore everything in the Bible is absolutely true- not a matter of faith. However science today is no longer about the facts, it is now just what scientists believe to be true based on some often ridiculous and completely unintuitive evidence (and who are you going to believe: Jesus or your lying eyes?).

So because the Bible is truth and therefore fact, the Bible is actually true science and what the scientists believe in, well that's just faith. I therefore ask all of you who agree with the Bible to show your support by refusing to ever wash your hands. Why? Because we all know that the germ theory of disease is JUST a theory (those stupid scientists even call it a theory!) and it's for sure that germs aren't mentioned anywhere in the Bible.
